A Venomous Serpent.

A specimen of the Hamadryas elaps, a venomous snake allied to the cobras, has been added to the collection of serpents in the Zoological Gardens, Lon-don. The scake is found in India, the Andaman and Philippine Islands and in New Guines. It preys habitually upon other snakes, attains a large size, some times measuring thirteen feet in length, and is a bold and formidable enemy. Its venom is fatal in a few minutes. Mr. Theobald stated that he heard of a well anthenticated case of a powerful male elephant being killed by its bite. The elephant "was pulling down with his trank some creepers or boughs, when a large Gnan (the Indian name of the serpent), which was disturbed in the tree, struck the elephant in the trunk between the eyes. The elephant at once re-treated, became faint and died in about three hours." Mr. Theobald relates of his personal knowledge that a suake charmer was bitten by one, and died of the wound immediately. The specimen in the Zoological Gardens is over seven feet in length, and is in excellent health. Shortly after his arrival he was fed with an ordinary snake, which he quickly bolted head first. The Hamadryas re-sembles the cobra, but has a less devel-oped hood, that, when spread, is seen to be marked with pretty bands. The head is somewhat almoud-shaped, and much like that of a lizard. When sitting up with hood expanded, the snake is constantly jerking its head in a restless manner. Its eye is clear and bright. When disturbed, it hisses loudly and extends its long, black, forked tongue, vibrating it with marvelous celerity.
